When our team first met Daisy as a “local translator” in Haiti, her lack of confidence and motivation quickly became evident. With slumped shoulders and a lack of interest, her demeanor was dejected and down.

Serving as a translator for the travel team, Daisy listened to the stories of how our lights could dramatically change lives. She sat with the Watts of Love team members and saw them explain our model: Save the kerosene money. Purchase an animal. Invest in yourself first.

The dream couldn’t have been further from Daisy’s reality. How could this work for someone like herself? She has 2 kids. She couldn’t afford to put them in school or pay for their much-needed doctor visits. She was barely able to feed them. Daisy unenthusiastically received her light. We wished her well and left Haiti.

One year later, we returned and heard Daisy would once again be our translator.

Daisy’s transformation was shocking. She stood tall, she stood strong, she asked if she could speak to the assembly of Haitian women herself to impart her wisdom as someone who had been in their shoes.

Daisy had bought chickens first ... and paid for her children’s medical bills. She bought pigs... and put her kids in school. She bought goats and made money to start a small business. Now she lived in abundance.

On our latest trip to Haiti, Daisy serves as a beacon of hope for her children and her community. There’s no stopping her. She has a thriving business, was able to build a new, safer home, and now their family owns a cow: the holy-grail of assets in Haiti. With one cow, Daisy will ultimately pay for 4-year-college for her child.
